Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Occidental College Bulletin, Vol. 1: November, 1906 The university is an institution that reaches out in every direction that it is able to reach. It does work in a great many lines. A college is necessarily, in a way, conservative. Its work lies along the line of drill and routine. A university is essentially radical, because its work is carried on through lines of investigation. We may compare, in a way, a university to a large hotel, with a very extensive bill of fare of various things. You read down through this and select what you want. A college ought to have only one set of dishes. It should be like the menu or bill of fare of a good boarding house; and a good boarding house may have just as good a bill of fare as a great hotel. The only question is, - are the things well chosen, are they well cooked; and the questions with the small college will be, - are the subjects which it chooses to teach well selected, and...
