The place was now entirely in ruins, the inhabitants having been made prisoners, and their town burnt by Thackombau. There remain now, only the oblong mounds of earth on each of which formerly stood a house, and the ditch and bank of earth, with which the village was fortified. The place is used now as a convict station, and here a number of prisoners, mostly Kaivolos, or devil men, from the hill tribes of the large island Viti-levu, were undergoing their various terms of imprisonment. Eight Tongan soldiers and an old English drill-sergeant were sufficient to keep the convicts in subjection. The men were made to work at clearing the surrounding land, and planting sweet potatoes and...
