Excerpt: . . . peasant riding a stunted gray horse, which carried its head close to the ground and was less uncouth in appearance than its master; or a dealer in furs, sitting in a cart drawn by a pair of reindeer; behind the cart a long rope would be dragging, with knots at frequent intervals, the said knots being supposed, as they jumped around in the road from one stone to another, to frighten off the wolves. If Ordener asked the dealer in furs to direct him to the cave of Walderhog, the answer would be: -- Keep to the northwest; you will come to the village of Hervalyn, pass through the ravine of Dodlysax, and by night you can make Surb, which is but two miles from Walderhog. Thus the nomad trader, who cared for nothing beyond the names and location of the places which lay on his route. But when Ordener put the same question to the peasant, who was deeply imbued with the traditions of the country and its fireside tales, that worthy would shake his head, and check his gray steed, saying: -- Walderhog! the Cave of Walderhog! There the stones sing, and the bones dance; and the demon Icelander lives there. Surely your Courtesy docsnt mean to go to the cave of Walderhog Indeed, I do, Ordener would reply. Has your Courtesy lost your mother, or has your farm been burned, or your neighbor stolen your fat hog Nothing of the kind. In that...
