That night of gloom was followed by a clear and resplendent morning. The sun arose without a cloud to obscure his ardent rays; and there was no evidence that two fierce thunder-storms had swept over the country during the previous night, save that which was found in the globules of rain in the glistening leaves and grass, the rivulets flowing by the wayside, and the muddy condition of the road. There was a very late breakfast at Mr. Belgrave's residence; but the persons who gathered around the board gave decided proof that the cloud was lifted from the family again, and that the old days of cheerfulness were in a fair way of restoration. Even Mrs. Belgrave, who had been suffering for weeks from depression of spirits and physical debility, was at her old place at the head of the table, presiding there with her usual dignity and grace. Near the mother sat the irrepressible Bessie, out of her wits with joy at her mother's re-appearance in the dining room. Clifford was there also, apparently enjoying the meal with great relish. The countenance of Charles was grave and thoughtful, but it betokened no unhappiness. William, from his place at the foot of the table, had, when they all sat down, offered up fervent thanks for the preservation of their lives and for the bounteous gifts of Providence conferred on them, concluding with a devout petition for the speedy restoration of his...
