His life would be always tinged with sadness; but now he had much to cheer him in the success of his efforts for the good of others, and her heart was lifted up in thankfulness to God, for His goodness towards him. Then many scenes of her life in India passed in review before her, and she thought of Gerard, who had been so nearly lost to her, but whom God had restored, now doubly her brother. Her thoughts lingered pleasantly, too, over the change in Lord Dasserdale, and then involuntarily they passed to the sermon of the last Sunday evening, and the use it had been of to the lonely widow. Deeply absorbed in this kind of dreamy meditation, she had not noticed any one entering the...
